Panarea Collection

She stood on the top deck looking out over the Isole Eolie sea. Rays of sunlight danced in the gentle waves that welcomed her back, while salty ocean wind waltzed with her hair. As her gaze skimmed the distant silhouettes of Panarea Island, her breath slowed, her eyes relaxed, and she surrendered to the warm embrace of the Mediterranean sun.

From the tiny port of San Pietro, she set off through narrow cobbled streets past the fragrant windowsills of quietly bustling kitchens. Up into the wild arid hills of Panarea, she stopped only to pick native berries and sweet Fico d'India. Eventually, she reached the volcanic cliffs of Calla Junco. With its stubborn patchy legions of Mediterranean flora and fauna lording it over an idyllic rock-strewn beach, it occurred to her that this could be Panarea in any other century, and she lost herself in thoughts of other worlds.

It was late afternoon, and a light breeze fussed with the waves on the shore. Soon, she realised, shades of peach, pink and purple would start threading their way through the blue Mediterranean sky. Into the narrow lanes she went, towards Raya, where she was to catch the sunset. Hurrying past the night flowers, beginning to broadcast their scent, she then stopped unexpectedly to admire the exultant beauty of an old turquoise door framed with bougainvillea, breathtaking in the afternoon light.

As dawn broke, and the first morning light shone onto the dark pebbles of Spiaggia Fumarola, the whole of Panarea looked like it had been painted a golden bronze. Making the steep descent to the beach unnoticed had been arduous, but this exquisite sight made it all worth it. For a moment she almost believed she was the only person on the whole island seeing the sun's majestic rise.

The colourful cascade of food on the table was mouth-watering to behold. At no time in her life had she ever gazed upon such tranquil and impossibly clear waters. From her vantage point up on the cliff, the sea sparkled like a luminous turquoise jewel and the only sound was the peaceful lapping of the waves against the rocks. Never would she stay away from Corisca so long again.

She hugged herself tight in the cool of the evening as she watched the day's final light fall behind the chain of mountains that seemed to march across most of the island. Corsica truly did feel like "a mountain in the sea" as the locals called it. Dusk set in and she turned to go back inside when suddenly she felt another pair of arms around her

She would not have ever thought it possible but Corsica seemed even more beautiful at night, with the full moon acting as a torch lighting up the sky. Its bright glow reflected down on the island's spectacular mountain range, casting an ethereal glow over its peaks. The guide touched her shoulder and urged her to keep moving—their journey must be completed before the sun's rise.

The breeze gently rustled the leaves of the olive trees above her, bringing a welcome respite from the heat of another afternoon in sun-drenched Corsica. She admired the single-minded focus of the harvesters as they studied each branch to see if its succulent black olives were ripe enough to yield the perfect golden oil the area was renowned for. Sometimes she longed to leave everything behind to pursue a simple, earthy life like this one.

St. Petersburg Collection

It was her first time in St. Petersburg but the captivating city already had her under its spell. Standing on the Trinity Bridge overlooking the Neva River she squared her shoulders, pulled her coat tighter and made her way past the obelisks flanking the entrance to the bridge. She knew the message she had come for would be waiting for her on the other side of the deep blue waters.

The desk in his study was cluttered and every item seemed to perfectly reflect him and his passions—a typewriter, copious notes covered in his messy scrawl, a well-spun globe, an empty whisky glass and his favourite picture of the two of them. Suddenly her eyes came to rest on his leather-bound journal, its worn cover holding all the secrets of both their story and his innermost thoughts. She hardly dared to look inside.

The magnificent baobab trees towered above her head, framing both sides of the endless dirt road stretching out in front of her. Their imposing trunks had lined these paths for nearly 1,000 years according to the village elders. If only they could share some of the landscape's secrets, she mused. She desperately hoped that someone in Madagascar would, otherwise her quest may prove fruitless.

The Bronze Age

The abandoned Pietrasanta foundry seemed to appear just as it had last been left. The molds were all in their original positions and it was difficult to believe the large furnace had not been lit for 50 years. She ran her fingers across the workshop floor beside the furnace, and found the hidden wooden panel almost immediately. Her face lit up with joy at the thought of retrieving the bronze molds and finally restoring them to their rightful owner.

They stood at the foot of the magnificent Mayan ruin La Danta, deep in the towering rainforest. As they looked towards the ancient heavens, her host began to tell her enchanting tales from the legends of Mayan astrology. With a twig from the forest floor, she traced the evolution of the planets, in a shape of three interlocking loops.

It was by pure coincidence that she found herself standing on St James's street, in front of the legendary Carlton Club. She had tremendously fond memories there, as she was one of the first women to be invited once it relaxed its policy. She remembered passing through the magnificent marble entrance, and up the stairs to the first floor landing, where she stood for a second and then turned into the Wellington Room where she knew he was waiting for her.

How wonderful to see him after so many years. His travels and stories had so often inspired her own, and now here they were, in the ancient heart of his world. Noiselessly, the young waiter placed two tiger shell coasters edged in brass on the table in front of them, before resting two freshly prepared gin and tonics down on them, and politely excusing himself.

They were so engaged in conversation that they didn't even notice the passing of time, and anyway, who knew when they might see each other again. It had been over five years since their last meeting, in Tangier at A L'Anglaise, when they had dined with Youssef Karim. With a gentle grace, the waiter reached into an elegant ice bucket, and placed a single hand carved ice cube into each of their drinks.

By now, they were the only two people left in the Wellington Room, accompanied only by the imposing portraits in the red room. It felt warmer and cosier than it had when she first walked in. In his inimitable way, he reached over to the wine cooler, almost to indicate that the contents of the bottle had been consumed. Fine wine, poured and appreciated like the fine sand inside an all too small Minutes had turned to hours, and she knew the day wouldn't last. But she lied to herself as the thought of not seeing him again saddened her. She realised the gin was making its way to her heart and her head. At that moment, the waiter in his crisp white uniform reappeared with savoury snacks on an exotic and elegant shell crackled tray with handles shaped like twisted wicker.

Her heart swelled with the tremendous honour of being the only foreigner at the royal wedding. From her vantage point on the palace walls, she watched a river of riches flow past below. Thirty princes dressed in shining gold followed the groom on his flower-festooned palanquin, while elephants in gilded headdresses processed among camels adorned with the most intricate embroidery she had ever seen.

They followed the Maharaja's soft footsteps down the winding halls of Umaid Bhawan until he stopped by a particularly old sandstone wall. With one hand he loosened a stone and slid it out. He reached in with the other and pulled out an enormous sapphire, and proceeded to tell us a story. His grandfather had commissioned the construction of the palace to offer employment during the great famine of the 1920s, and during the first day of construction a worker had found this stone in the bedrock. Instead of keeping it to himself, the only request of this honest peasant was for the palace to be built around it.

Standing at Piazzale Michelangelo on a crisp December dawn, she watched her favorite city come to life. At first, the only sounds were the pigeons flapping in the square, followed by the sound of a lone Vespa delivering bread, as the driver bade her a polite good morning. She could feel nothing but joy and excitement. So many wonderful things had happened since the last time she was here. This was a city that seemed to always signify the closing of a chapter and the start of a new one.

It was in this secluded part of the Palazzo Vecchio that she first came across the Medici Hall of Maps. A magnificent walk-in-wardrobe for the grand Medici dukes, each of the 53 cabinets featured a painted map, a flawless guide to 16th Century knowledge, snaking its way around the room. In the center sat a giant globe, half a millenium old, and painted with a second skin by infinite exhalations over the passing of time. The world seemed so small, as she wound herself around its form in a spiral, from Italy, past Turkey, into the wilds of Western Russia and into Asia.

She often found solace in the old Laurentian library. Designed by Michelangelo himself, it contained the rare sixth century Syrian Rabula Gospels which she loved to nurse in her arms, settling in a ray of sunlight on a well-worn Chesterfield, and becoming momentarily transfixed by a gentle thread of satin grey smoke rising from a distant chimney, high in the Florentine sky.

It was probably already too late, but she convinced herself otherwise and walked briskly along Via Dei Giorlami, the quickly moving cloud overhead seeming to keep pace. As she reached the doors of the Caffè Delle Carrazze, she caught sight of the rapidly flowing Arno and paused. She couldn't help but think that the next time she set eye on the river, her life might be very different just like the tempestuous Arno, with its constantly changing torrents and trickles. She took a deep breath and walked inside.

Standing still in the midday sun at the Piazza Della Signoria, she smiled. The first time she saw the Palazzo Vecchio she felt so small below its rugged stone walls, as they stood to attention, protecting the treasures of knowledge within. Quietly she whispered 'rocca'—fortress—and at that very moment an unopened letter flapped in the breeze and rested at her feet. She looked down, convinced she recognized the handwriting.

Lowering herself into the crystal-clear waters of the Al Hemma hot springs at night, she felt her mind clearing. The locals had believed in the rejuvenating powers of these springs and their minerals for hundreds of years. Gazing up at the dark sky above she pondered the juxtaposition of feeling so relaxed but also filled with excitement and nerves at what—or who—she would find in Petra.

The night before her trip to Al-Khazneh her hosts served a humble meal of maqlouba and fattoush. Just the aroma was tantalising and deliciously warming on such a cold night. After eating she stood on the terrace, gazing at the imposing giant red mountains at Wadi Musa, quite entranced as nightfall cast its shadow across them. She knew she would not get a wink of sleep that night.

Finally she stood before the great Al-Khazneh, Petra's most famed and elaborate temple, and one of the reasons for her long journey. She understood now why the locals called Petra 'Rose City'. The temple was made entirely of sandstone, and its rock-face was a beautiful dusky rose. She felt someone watching and turned to see a familiar face filled with warmth. She had found him, and he had found her.

Argo Collection

She picked up one of Argo's cymbals, and traced over its rough irregular lines with her fingers. They met years ago, as she wandered down Halicilar Street near the Grand Bazaar. Argo was the most unlikely of characters—a tall confident woman with the hands of an artisan, toughened by years of pouring tin, copper and silver. A hard job usually reserved for men. She was the only female cymbal maker in the city's history and she took enormous pride in continuing her family's legacy. A family of alchemists, they had been making cymbals for the Sultan of then-Constantinople since the 1920s.

Though she hadn't known Liu Fang and his family long, she wanted to honour them with a gift to reflect their kindness to her. As daylight's incessant symphony of car horns slowed to a quiet punctuation in tandem with the falling sun, she found a little shop—the luck of the traveller. Her eyes were drawn to a picturesque hill of woven baskets. Reaching down to the dusty floor, she picked one up and packed it full of the most delicious gifts the shop had to offer: rice cakes, sweet potatoes and juicy tangerines.

There was an audible gasp in the room and then a moment of silence as the velvet curtain was drawn and the vase was unveiled. The white sphere in front of them was hundreds of years old and yet the clarity of the diamonds that encircled it were still astounding. The auction began and paddles were raised in the air, each bidder hungrier than the last to claim it for themselves but it was already hers--she would not be leaving without it.

She was moved to silence each time she saw the golden sands of the Sahara but it was the desert's stone plateaus that took her breath away, and the Ennedi Plateau was perhaps the most astonishing she had seen. She had traveled to the formation for a reason and now it loomed in front of her—a Neolithic painting thousands of years old left behind by herders with a message that she was there to interpret.

It wasn't that she was afraid, although finding her way out was going to be a challenge. It was more that she had the unusual sensation of being lost in time as she crawled further inside the frozen Grotta Di Tofana. At the exact moment she reached the belly of the mountain, a shimmer reflected the beam of her torch directly into her eyes. As they adjusted to the new surroundings, the inside of the mountain lit up like a million glistening diamonds, and she saw the majestic beauty of a thousand prehistoric ice crystal stalactites.

She had always loved the bustle of the Anhui Province farmers market—the cries of the negotiations were actually providing some sanctuary from her own thoughts. She couldn't say what drew her to the hawker's old Baijiu flask, but she had to have it. He finally relented, flashing a huge toothy grin, as he pressed a cold piece of jade into her palm. For luck he said, which was something she knew she would need.

She came to the quiet streets of Tsukishima island every time she visited Tokyo. Standing still, she touched the cool cast stone wall in front of her, admiring how seamlessly its façade blended with the wooden frame of its doorways. Not dissimilar to Tokyo itself she thought, and the inexplicable way it seemed to blend old world traditions with an ultra-modern urban jungle that never stops. She was back, and it felt like she had never left.

The overhead fan was barely rotating, unfortunate as it was a particularly humid summer in Hansai Prefecture. With precision, the bookbinder unrolled the canvas bag, unveiling a perfectly preserved samurai sword. In hushed tones, he told her 'This belonged to Saitō Hajime, captain of the third unit of the Shinsengumi.' It was not the flash of the blade that aroused her, but the shagreen hilt of the Katan Samurai sword that had once belonged to a great warrior.

Samurai Collection

The proud bookbinder seemed to consider her for a second as she turned the hilt in her hands. Unhurriedly, he unrolled the canvas a little further, and revealed another Katana Samurai sword, this one somehow even more intricate. Engraving snaked along the blade, up to the hilt, which was blackest shagreen. 'It's the colour of night and mystery. Saitō Hajime saw this as an extension of himself.'

Storybook Collection

The Odyssey Collection

The Odyssey Collection

SV Casa launches 'The Odyssey' Collection, named after Horner's literary masterpiece portraying the same sense of mystery and intrigue. Following the success of the brand's "One Thousand & One Nights" collection, the latest products are inspired by fashion trends straight from the runway. This new collection reinterprets the iconic SV Casa essentials with animal prints, contemporary patterns and bold colours in shell, finished with grey and orange resin for striking contrast. These talking pieces are balanced using understated, intricate works featuring elegant silver and brass touches and an element of Chinoiserie.
